'That something after death,' long before Shakspeare's time, 'puzzled the will,' and to it may be attributed much of the absurdity that characterizes the believers in the later revelations. It is a sort of innocent eaves dropping, that trying to get near the mysterious vail that hangs suspended in the fingers of God, between this world and another, and striving to fill 'the fearful hollow' of their listening ears-were we malicious, we should say heads-with the voices they overhear in the realm of spirits .- They seem to fancy that like the veil of the Temple, this curtain too is rent, but we greatly fear they are deceiving or deceived-that the same spirit which caused the milk-maid to cross the Gipsey's palm with silver, or people to consult vasty deep, and subject them to the pains and penalties of Yankee catechism. Exploration of the Niger.

The committee on Commerce in the United States Senate, a few days since, reported a bill providing for an exploration of the Niger. The Niger has not yet been explored by vessels more than four hundred miles from its mouth, and it is believed to be navigable for some two thousand miles. A letter from T. J. Bowen, Esq., showing the importance and practicability of the expedition, accompanies the bill. From this letter we make the following extract : "The extensive country of Sudan, or Central Africa, lying on both sides of the Niger, is very different, in most respects, from Western Africa, or Guinea. The surface of the country is generally undulating, the soil more or less productive, the streams numerous, clear and rocky, and beautiful. Most of the country is open and grassy, with scattering trees, which give it very much the appearance of mesquite prairies in western Texas. So far as I have seen and heard from the native travelers, there are no chains of mountains of considerable length; but short chains and patches of mountainous hills are common in some districts, and we frequently meet with isolated hills, some of masses of granite, rising abruptly from the plain. The elevation of land as we proceed from the coast is gradual, so as to be favorable to the opening of roads, and yet so high that Captain Clapperton saw frost and ice in the Hausac country within 12 degrees of the equator.

"The people of Sudan are of two classes, called in that country 'black men' and 'red men.' The latter may be described as woolly headed Indians. They are numerous on both sides of the Niger, amounting perhaps in all to twenty or thirty millions; some of them, as the Pulags, are Mahommedans, but others mentioned by Caille, like many of the blacks in Sudan, are heathens.

"In some respects the Sudanese are considerably advanced from mere barbarism. Several rude arts are commonly practised, but the great business of the people is agriculture, in which they are far more successful and much more industrious than we have previously supposed.

"Between Abbeokuta and the Niger, that is within a distance of 160 miles, there are more than a dozen large towns, some of which are more populous than Abbeokuta. The greatest of these in population, if not in size also, is Ilorin, the capital of a little Pulon kingdom of the same name. Here there are many red or light colored people, and thousands of men who can read and write Arabic, the only kind of writing known in Sudan. But according to the people at Ilorin, the largest of all African towns is Ohwoh, six days' journey (say 100 miles) beyond the Niger. We have not yet been able to visit that town, owing to the pressure of other business.

" Some of the principal exports of Sudan, if the trade were opened, would be gold, ivory, gums, palm oil, vegetable butter, hides, camwood, and indigo of unrivalled quality. Some of the imports would be various kinds of cloth, blankets, felt hats, coral beads and other ornaments, tobacco-which is used by everybody, male and female-guns, and gunpowder. All the millions of Central Africa desire to buy something, and all by one means or another could pay for it." At present the principal foreign trade of the countries beyond the Niger is carried on across the great desert by means of camels. The people of Western Sudan trade with the coast of Guinea. Should the feasibility of navigating the Niger be the Madames with unpronounceable names, as established, there would be created new centers of sumed for the occasion, as to the great and little trade, which would call the productions of the to be's' of their mortal life, is influencing the country to this stream, and the caravan trade across older and the graver to summon up spirits from the the desert and to Guinea would be broken up. Every year would add to the civilization of the country and to the development of its resources, is prompted by an unworthy desire to read what is until finally a commerce worth millions of dollars per annum would be established.

We see it stated that the British Government have arranged to dispatch annually, for five years, a small steamer to explore the Niger river for scientific and commercial purposes .- [ Yreka Union.

A Beautiful Illustration.

We take the following from the last number of the Atlantic Monthly. It is a portion of an admirable article entitled the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

Did you never, in walking in the fields, come across a large flat stone, which had lain, nobody knows how long, just where you found it, with the grass forming a little hedge, as it were, all round it, close to its edges,-and have you not, in obedience to a kind of feeling that told you it had been lying there long enough, insinuated your stick or your foot or your fingers under its edge and turned that the doves can bring the leaves of the Olive it over as a housewife turns a cake, when she says across the dark waters to the windows of the soul to herself, " It's done brown enough by this -that gentle eyes, although we see them not, are time." The stone is an ancient error. The grass is human nature borne down and bleached of all its heads beneath their wings, each on his own pillow; color by it. The shapes that are found beneath the flowers, those children of the rainbow, that are the crafty beings that thrive in darkness, and wrap their mantles round them, and seek repose; the weaker organisms kept helpless by it.
